With its cool summers, fertile plains, abundant game and lush green scenery, Sintra has always attracted royalty and aristocracy. In the XVIII and XIX centuries, the bucolic and mysterious beauty of Sintra was described by numerous foreign writers and poets, inspired by the Romantic Period, and several palaces and manor houses came to prosper.

The exuberant German-born prince consort, Fernando of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha built the magnificent Pena Palace, a Sintra icon and a symbol of Portuguese Romanticism. In the XX century, Sintra was recognised as a summer retreat, visited by aristocrats and millionaires from all over the world.

Today, Sintra continues to be a cultural hub, the stage for endless musical festivals, art exhibitions and open-air performances.

The Legend of Seteais

In 1147, one of the first Christian knights to climb the Sintra Mountains was Dom Mendo de Paiva. He found a secret door through which several Moors were trying to escape. Among them was a beautiful young Moorish girl accompanied by an old lady in waiting. When she saw the knight, the young girl shouted “ai!”. When Dom Mendo de Paiva told the young girl he was taking her prisoner, the girl screamed “ai!” once more. The lady in waiting then revealed that her mistress had been put under a spell and would die on the day that she said seven “ais”.

When she heard of this secret, the young girl let out her third “ai!”.

Dom Mendo did not believe in such nonsense and while he was taking both ladies prisoner, the girl screamed “ai!” once more. She sighed and the lady in waiting shouted: “That’s the fifth ai!” The knight told them to wait where they were as he was going to take them to a safe place.

As soon as he had left, a group of Moors appeared to rob the women. With a hefty blow from a dagger, they cut off the lady in waiting’s head. Seeing her die, the young girl let out a mournful “ai”. This was the sixth and the seventh was the last thing she said when she saw the dagger coming towards her.

When Dom Mendo returned, he swore revenge for the death of the young girl. In memory of the Beautiful Moorish girl he named that secluded area of Sintra, ‘Seteais’ - ‘Seven Ais’.

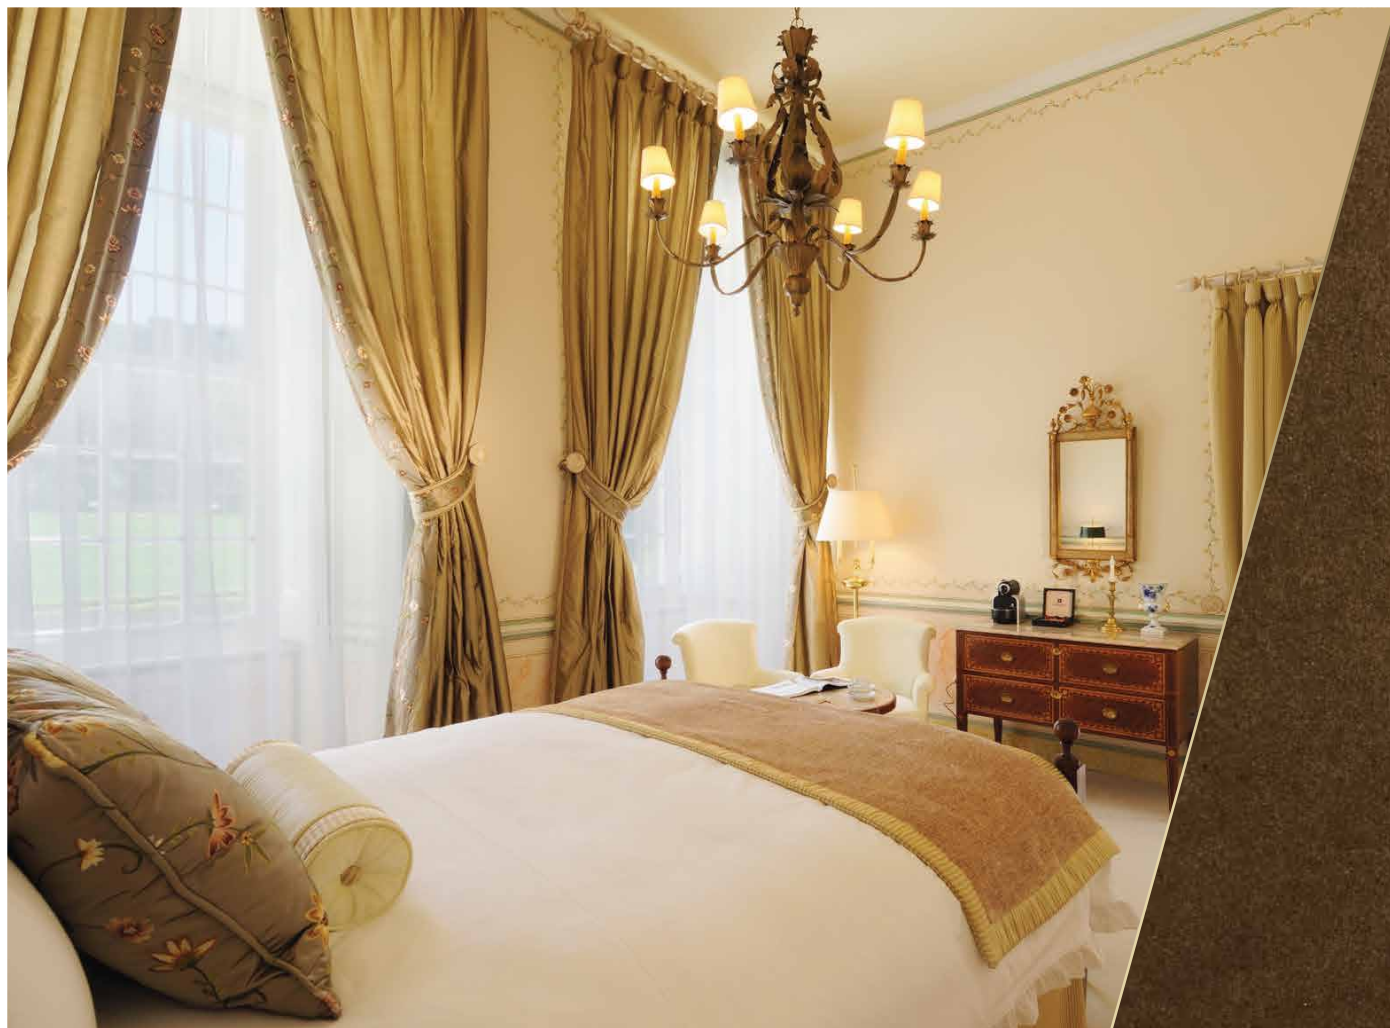

Even today, in the Seteais gardens there’s a place where if you shout “ai” you’ll hear an echo come back seven times, in honour of the Beautiful Moorish girl who died there.
